PUCK'S CARTOON

The American Farmer.

The whole tariff question so far as it affects the farmer is graphically summarized in Puck of August 15. The cartoon is entitled "The American Farmer-Where he has to sell, and where he has to buy."

On one side of the picture the farmer is offering his products, corn, wheat, pork, beef, etc .- in the free trade markets of Europe. He has to compete there with Russian, Australian and South American farmers. It is the open competition of this market which determines not only the prices which he obtains for imported products, but also the prices of the greater part of the same products sold at home. He compets with the cheap est farm labor in the world. He has no special privileges. His share of the protection in the McKinley bill was bogus.

On the other side of the picture the farmer is making purchases of clothing, implements, furniture etc. He is not in the free and open markets of are competing with each other for his Kinley's "Home Market" and high prices. Everything is "marked up' according to the tariff duty placed upon it and to the firmness of the trust which regulates production and prices of this particular product. Mc-Kinley put no sawdust in the protection which he gave to the trusts and manufacturers. They do not hesitate to charge the poor and deluded farmer 50 per cent, more than he would have to pay for his goods in the same market in which he sells his products. His money goes only two-thirds as far with "protection" as it wouldand will without it.

This is all there is to the tariff question for the farmer. He has been fooled and buncoed in voting for this gigantic fraud, but he is getting his eyes open and unless Lincoln was mistaken when he said "You can't fool all the people all of the time, there will be some surprise for Mc-Kinley in the returns from next November's elections in the country districts of the West and North.

A Few Points on Etiquette.

The social season is about to open and the following few points of etiquette are appropos:

Girls should bear in mind that it is a lady's place to recognize a gentleman first as it depends on her whether the acquantance continues or not.

In entering a room the gentleman always follows the young lady.

Always rise for an older person. The young lady always seats herself first before any gentleman will do

In making introductions the young man is always presented to the girl, never the other way round.

Never introduce any young man to your girl friends without first asknig their permission, and then say: "Miss D, I want to present (or introduce) Mr. A to you."

It is sufficient to acknowledge an It is sufficient to acknowledge an introduction by a simple bow, unless plucked from its head its projecting there is some special reason for more horns, which on closer inspection provcordial forms. Handshaking is not good form in an introduction in a ball ing of an actually harmless animal, and room.

A Horse's Memory.

A special from Wooster says: That horses have memories, and good ones too, is shown by an incident which took place on the fair grounds. Two torments and go right along with a years ago the trotter, "Woodbird," smile on my face, while you swear and tear around like mad if you bump your while quartered in a stall on the fair head while hunting a collar button. grounds, was terribly frightened by New York Weekly.

The poor beast was in such fear that he had to be removed. This year he was again taken to the stall. When he saw the manger he began trembling violently, and finally fell over and acted as though taken with a chill. All efforts to quiet the horse failed, and he was taken to another stall, where he become quiet and contented.

THE TERRIER AND THE LIONS. Size Did Not Count as Regarded Ownership of the Cage.

Kindness is powerful with animals, but I have often been led to think that where kindness fails impudence conquers. In Lincoln park, Chicago, I saw a lady put her hand on the heads of three lions in succession and stroke their ears as if they were kittens. They growled when she pretended to leave, and when she returned they fought among themselves for the first chance of being petted again. But this lady had nursed these lions, and they seemed to know her as a child knows its mother.

There was a little Scotch terrier in the cage with the same lions. He did nothing but bark and snarl and snap at them. One good swish of any one of the three tails would have wiped him out of existence. But he just ordered the big animals around as if he were the lion and they the rat catchers. They obeyed, although with the long deep rumblings as of muffled thunder.

He was not a pretty dog, nor was his voice calculated to make him many friends. He was in no danger of being worried by encores. I don't know that he had any moral qualities worth bragging about. But he was Scotch. He had the reputation of being a terror as well as a terrier, and he had a broken leg. Perhaps as an invalid he appealed to the sympathies of his big companions. This, however, would not account for his insolent airs of superiority.

He took the best of the food. He go the first and the last shake hands from the lady. His barefaced impudence was more powerful than all the kindness and attention of the gentle nurse. And he gave nothing for his living except his bark. For the struggle of life he had no equipment but impudence, and yet he kept three lions in what must have been literally a condition of galling servitude. There is room somewhere here for a moral. But Æsop is dead. And when he lived he tacked morals only to fables, where indeed they seem to belong. - Donahoe's Magazine.

THE TELEPHONE DEADBEAT.

How He Gradually Comes to Believe Tha He Owns Your Instrument.

"If there is a variety of deadbeats, said an eminent citizen the other morn ing, "which annoys me more than all others, it is the man who moves into your building because you have a telephone. At first he drops into your office and tells you his wife bade him order a steak before noon and that he had forgotten whether it was porterhouse or sirloin. He says that a family across the street from his house has a phone, and that with your permission he'll the world where all manufacturers just ring 'em up and have 'em send for Mrs. X. Then the husband begins to drop in to telephone his commercial acquaintances until two-thirds of his entire business is done over your wire. There is only one more step. One of his agents is up, say, at Mount Morris, and it is very necessary to communicate with him immediately. As much as $4 may depend upon a word. He hurries in and says of course you have connected with Mount Morris. It is marvelous how man's inventions put the miles at

All the felidæ possess poisonous breaths, intended by nature to act as an anæsthetic on their prey. If a person cares to experiment by inhaling, for instance, a cat's breath, they can easily realize the truth of this statement. Carefully watch a cat playing with a captured mouse. You will discover that the mouse does not suffer, but is sort of stupefied, as if by chloroform. In the 'Life of Livingstone," written by himself of explorations in Africa, he states and his arm broken the crunching of the broken arm gave him no pain, so benumbed were his senses by the animal's breath. A cat seeks the child for its soft bed and the warmth of its bed and lies down on the chest of the infant. Its weight impedes respiration, its breath anæsthetizes the child, and death follows. This circumstance has actually occurred, and medical records conclusively prove it.-Brooklyn Standard-

MODERN SURGERY.

The Large Part That Absolute Cleanlines Plays In Its Operations.

There are three locations, so to speak, the absolute cleanliness of which must be above suspicion before the operator is justified in proceeding to his work. These are the surgeon's hands, his instruments and the integument covering the part of the patient's body at which the operation is about to be performed. How is the requisite cleanliness in each case secured? So far as the hands are concerned, by profuse scrubbing with a nailbrush in soap and hot water, followed by a thorough drenching in some antiseptic solution, as that of 1 in 2,000 of perchloride of mercury. So far as the instruments are concerned, by sterilizing them-that is, by boiling them in water, or by passing them through the flame of a spirit lamp, or placing them in a steam sterilizer, and then, when the operator is ready to begin, by putting them into a receptacle containing an antiseptic solution—as, for example, that of carbolic acid. Lastly, so far as the patient's integument is concerned, by washing the part first thoroughly with soap and water, having previously shaved it, if necessary, and afterward with a perchloride of mercury solution, or, if the part be greasy, by removing all the greasy material by scrubbing it with other.

Without going into further details these are the cardinal precepts of the science of operating in the present day. Of course each wound which in this manner is made under aseptic conditions, as it is called, is kept aseptic by the use of antiseptic dressings until healing has taken place. The results of this method of treatment of wounds are nothing less than wonderful in comparison with those which the earlier surgeons were able to obtain. What happens after, say, the amputation of a limb nowadays? The rule is, nothingnothing, that is to say, beyond the uneventful convalescence of the patient. The dressings are not touched unless the temperature and the pulse of the pait would be expedient to examine the wound. The temperature and the pulse are the surgeon's guide. He takes his one from them. Nothing can be amiss in the wound if these remain normal, and thus it follows that a large wound, such as that following an amoutation. heals soundly from first to last without any suppuration. What a contrast with that which obtained in former days Suppuration was then thought to be an indispensable part of the healthy process of healing. In the present time, on the contrary, a surgeon is held to have failed in his practice of the principles of surgical cleanliness if, in wounds originally aseptic, suppuration occurs -Nineteenth Century.

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE.

Getting the Obelisk Absard Ship a Pretty Piece of Engineering.

"One of the pleasantest recollections have to look back on," said Adam Johnson, "is the fact that I was one of the party that helped to run up the American colors over Cleopatra's needle when it was being taken down to be carried to New York. Our vessel was out in the Medite Lucan with a roving commission, and we were at Alexandria at the time the obelisk was ring mov-ed. The big stone had been p. sented by the Egyptian government to this country, but the people were wild about havthat once when he was seized by a lion | ing it moved. We h: place a guard around the men who were working on the shaft, and even then there was almost a riot.

> "But that was one of the prettiest pieces of engineering work I have ever seen. The engineers who were moving our shaft had a couple of big wooden cases built that fitted around the needle like the pieces of wood around the lead in a pencil. There were a couple of projectiles on each side of the casings just on the center of gravity in the shaft, like the trunnions on a cannon. Under these they put lifting jacks and just picked that immense stone off its pedestal, swung it around horizontal and then lowered it as gently as could be on a long sliding way, with cannon balls under it for rollers. They had a square hole cut in the stern of the steamship and slid it into the hull through that and replaced the sheathing

"Under the shaft in the inside of the pedestal there were a lot of bronze toads and ornaments and the Lord knows what not that the Masons claimed were placed there by some of their progenitors cons ago. I don't know anything about that, though, and you can leave it or take it, as you choose. "The British were not half so slick with the obelisk they carried over to England. They cased it up in a big sheet iron arrangement like a boiler, riv-eted it in and floated the whole thing off through a trench dug in the sand

HER LITTLE FLOWER.

And She Sank to Rest Clutching the Tiny Treasure to Her Breast, She found the tiny, tender plant when first it showed its trembling head above the travel worn slabs of granite that paved the narrow alleyway which was her only playground. She gave a cry of delight when she saw the delicate shoot peoping out from between the cold gray stones, and from that moment it filled a part of her life that heretofore had been empty. She nourished it with water and jealously guarded it from the onslaught of roaming boys and the too near approach of cart wheels that came crunching through the alley, and often did her violet eyes tremble with suppressed tears as she saw the ponderous wheels rolling so close to her treasure.

Under her care and watchful attention it steadily grew, and when delicate eaves unfolded themselves and disclosed to her delighted eyes a blossom of sweetness her happiness was complete, and she sank beside it and feasted her vision on loveliness she had never seen

One day she did not come at her sual hour to moisten the thirsty plant, and it would doubtless have perished but for a gentle shower that came to kiss the drooping head The next day she did not come, and the lonely plant got its only help from the leaking of a passing water cart. Far up in one of the narrow rooms she lay on a little cot panting for breath. Her once rosy heeks were now pale and white, and the soft blue eyes shone with a sparkling glow. Her head tossed restlessly from side to side, and moans of pain crept from the drawn lips.

Occasional words broke from her, but of such an incoherent nature that none understood her until a boy came softly into the room and gazed at the suffering face curiously. "She wants her flower, he said as she moaned again, and like a flash he sped from the room, to return in a few moments bearing an almost withered plant in his hand. As he held it aloft the lustrous eyes saw it, and two tiny wasted hands arose from the cover and were outstretched to receive her treasure. She lifted it to her lips and rained kisses on the dust covered blossom, which seemed to answer her caress in a gleam of returning freshness.

She sank to sleep, still clutching the flower to her bosom, and awoke later with a calm look of contentment covering her features.

As the hours were on she grew weaker and weaker until, when the shafts of morning's golden light first found their way into the quiet room, they fell aslant the cold, still form of a little girl, at whose cheek nestled a faded and withered flower, mingling itself in the faint smile that lingered yet around the perfect month. - Atlanta Constitution.

Washington's "Finest." Here and there in the halls and corridors of the capitol the sturdy guardians of the public peace, clad in immac ulate uniforms sit, silent and indifferent ruminating, to judge from the slow and regular action of their jaws, upon the destinies of the nation, though caring for none of these things. Fine specimens most of them are, too-broad shouldered, healthy skinned, fair, quiet men, whose solid nerves nothing could surprise, whose firm but gentle mastication no political convulsion could retient indicate, by some disturbance, that tard. They are of a very different type
